MY CAPSULE COLLECTION OVERBOARD EXPLORES MY GRANDAD'S LIFE AND LOVE FOR SAILING AROUND THE WORLD. THIS IS A PERSONAL COLLECTION, RESEARCHING MY GRANDFATHER'S JOY FOR LIFE, MEMORIES AND PASSION FOR SAILING. MY COLLECTION FOCUSES ON SUSTAINABILITY, I FOCUSED ON COMBINING SAILING AND FISHING TO CREATE A SUSTAINABLE FASHION SOLUTION; 90% OF MY MATERIALS ARE SUSTAINABLE UTILISING OFFCUTS, DEADSTOCK FABRICS, OLD BROKEN BOAT SAILS, FISHING NETTINGS AND ROPE. I HAVE EXPLORED TRADITIONAL SAILOR/NAUTICAL/FISHING GARMENTS AND COMBINED IT WITH THE INFLUENCE OF THE SILHOUETTES FROM BOAT SAILS AND THE LINES FROM ROPE. REALLY EXPLORING THE PRACTICAL FEATURES TO CREATE EXPERIMENTAL GARMENTS.

Between 1895 and 1912 eight men of the Palmer family were awarded medals for courageous service in the lifeboats. Here, Edward 'Shemo' Palmer in his canvas hat and guernsey portrays their workaday lives as longshore fishermen. (Alfred Corry Museum)

Sporting his distinctive tam o' shanter, beachman 'Fitz' Hurr is possibly the Henry H. Hurr listed as bowman of the Southwold lifeboat in 1896. Six other Hurrs were among the seventy-eight longshoremen deemed worthy to serve. (Alfred Corry Museum)

The drifters usually reached the fishing grounds and were ready to start their nets in dark, the time when the herring 'swam' or rose to the surface to feed on the plankton that made up their diet. The nets were 'dredged', and the boat allowed to drift with the tide, the crew then hauling time for a net and row until the skipper decided it was time to haul, usually sometime after midnight.

When the nets were on board the herring could be shaken from the mesh, when they had been caught by the gills, and shuffled with wooden shovels into the hold of the boat. The boat landed without a break for at least five hours, a heavy catch often taking twice as long.
