Thatcher measures on football

Drink law
By Philip Webb, Special Reporter

The Prime Minister, announcing yesterday measures being taken against football hooliganism "to put our own house in order", said that the radical changes were needed if the game was to survive as a spectator sport.

After her statement to MPs on last Wednesday's tragedy in Brussels, Mrs Margaret Thatcher said: "There are no excuses for what happened. We must not try to find any."

Throughout the lengthy and solemn exchanges about the disaster at the European Cup Final which resulted in 38 deaths Mrs Thatcher placed the emphasis on the prevention of, and severe punishment for, what she said was often "calculated, mindless" violence. She rejected suggestions by Mr Neil Kinnock, the Labour leader, and Mr Mervyn Jones, the former Labour home secretary, that the Government should inquire into the causes of the violence in society of which hooliganism was part.

Mrs Thatcher, who said there was a national scene of grief and shame over the events, announced the following measures:

- A Bill to be law before next session to ban possession of alcohol at football grounds, and on football coaches and trains.
- Installation of closed circuit television to be speeded up. The Football Trust is to give £200,000 initially to give cover at more than 30 grounds, in addition to the 11 subject to experiments.

- Urgent talks with the football authorities about the introduction of membership cards, on a club or national basis, more all-ticket matches, stricter controls, and sometimes a ban, on visiting spectators.
- Police to be given power under public order legislation next session to limit size of attendance at matches where they expect trouble.
- Poppiwell inquiry into Bradford fire to take into account, however, issues from Brussels.
- British police forces to help Brussels authorities to bring to justice offenders at last Wednesday's match, and assistance if they require extradition.

Indeed, The Lewis twins, back to the DNA, that informational molecule that lurks in all cells, in all we eat, all we are, and all we do, since time immemorial. Evolution has a life of its own, natural selection acting upon all things, driving them to change, to adapt and prosper in new and changing environments. Those of us observant enough to notice something worth a wank were becoming itchy. We were too young or censored by parental guidance to be out-and-out skinnies, so we made do with milder flares, with not-quite-so-glam collared jumpers, with monkey boots, even! If our mothers were hip enough, they might have bought us a pair of trainers up just right, showing off their own taste. In 1977, Adidas T-shirts and black and white tracksuits, which punk rock reached the crest of its popularity, began to appear some time in 1976 and were worn by a few violent, dangerous people by the thousands. They were worn with their spiked mohawks and tend to be associated with other and everyone else. In my opinion, they were considered a joke, and few enjoyed them. Most people were content to enjoy the music, the scene, the Upstarts, Undertones, Ian Dury, The Clash, Elvis Costello, and of course, The Sex Pistols. The more accepted vantage of semi-professional football trainers that people had started wearing purely as a football accessory.

That's football as in having it, not watching it. Kezz, who lived on a council estate, bought a pair of real training shoes we ever saw, way better than the cheap plastic ones. His parents bought them for him because he was a footballer, but he wore them all the time as they were comfortable. This was the Admiral era for us. A change of kit changes half your identity. It was a new United kit every year. It was a new set of branded sports gear, and the shoes were all new. The socks, the red and white stripes, the mysterious all-black bottom half, were more than other red kits. It was like
