

“If you ever saw, they’re just too amazing,” says Gerald Creed, an anthropology professor at Hunter College and the Graduate Center, CUNY. “They monopolize the senses. You can’t look away.”

Kukeri is a centuries-old tradition intended to chase evil spirits away. Men and boys dress up in furs and animal skins, put scary masks on their faces, and jump with huge bells tied around their waists. It is believed that the Kukeri monsters are so ugly that any real monster would run away screaming.

Everything in the play is grotesque and supposed to make the spectators laugh dancing rhythmically to drive away evil and invite good.

Draping a tailored sleeve for the jacket from Look 3 based on the thickness of the leather

